Exercise 8: Think and discuss

Dickens introduces the problem of social class and ambition by presenting us people of the lower class and the working class. The man, Pip met on the marsh, depicts the lower class: a desperate, half-starving victim who is rejected by society. Pip, Joe, and Mrs. Joe are representatives of the working class. Joe Gargery works as a blacksmith and earns enough money to keep his family and provide them with sufficient food. Unlike the prisoner from the marsh, Pip has comfortable surroundings (food, house and relatives). His sister and brother-in-law are reputed citizens of their town. Everyday difficulties that Pip faces are caused by his closest relative – his sister, not by physical want.

Exercise 8: Think and discuss

The author focuses on the problem of guilt. The main hero, a small boy, feels guilty about not telling his brother-in-law about stealing some food and the file. However, Pip does not feel this guilt because of stealing the necessary things for the convict but instead he feels the guilt toward Joe whom he loves. (Pip is not going to tell Mrs. Joe about his offense because he feels nothing to her.) On the contrary, as the boy loves his sister's husband, he believes he should be honest with the blacksmith. This love, nevertheless, stops Pip from telling the truth. He is afraid that the blacksmith will never be able to trust and love him again. The fear of losing a good relationship with the only close person prevents the orphan from being frank.

Exercise 8: Think and discuss

One of the symbols of Great Expectation is Satis House. Estella tells us that, satis means "enough". For her it signifies "whoever had this house, could want nothing else". Pip understands that the house means much more. It is a house iced in time by the arrogance and obstinacy of its owner. Satis House, hence, represents stagnation and decay, readers can take it for fading. Satis House and Miss Havisham are both dying. Miss Havisham thinks she is superior and neglects people in lower social positions. That's why Estella under her influence hates Pip for being a poor boy. Satis House is ruined because of the spoiled owner: abandoned, destroyed, and devastated.

Miss Havisham keeps benefactor's name in secret in order not to confuse the poor boy.

He wants to be a gentleman but doesn't think about business.

CHAPTERS SCRIPTS

Chapters 1-2

In Chapter 1 of Great Expectations readers meet a boy named Philip Pirrip, nicknamed Pip, as he gazes at the graves of his parents in a church cemetery on a stark marsh near the sea. He's a sweet kid who's had a lot of misfortune dealt to him. Suddenly a scary-looking man appears in the cemetery and threatens Pip picking him up, spinning him around and telling him to keep quiet or he'll cut his throat. The man wears a large iron on his leg. Petrified, Pip pleads for his life. The man asks know what the boy's name is and where he lives and Pip tells him. When the man asks about Pip's mother, Pip explains that his parents are dead and buried in the graveyard, and he lives with his sister and her husband. The man orders Pip to get him a file and food. If Pip fails in this task, the man says his younger companion will find Pip during the night and tear out his heart and liver. Terrified, young Pip swears to comply.

In Chapter 2 of Great Expectations Pip arrives home where he sees his sister's husband, Joe Gargery, a blacksmith, warming himself by the fire. Pip describes Joe as a gentle, physically strong, dimwitted soul, and the two have formed a close bond that helps them endure the rages, scolding and beatings of Joe's wife, referred to as Mrs. Joe. Mrs. Joe is Pip's sister. Mrs. Joe bursts into the house, strikes Pip with a stick called the tickler, and throws the boy at Joe. Furious, Mrs. Joe asks where Pip has been, and the boy replies that he was at the churchyard. She complains about having to care for Pip then prepares tea and gives her brother bread and butter. Concerned about not being able to find food for the convict on the marshes, Pip hides his piece of bread in his trousers.

It's Christmas Eve and Pip stirs the pudding for the next day. Then he hears guns firing in the distance and asks why that's happening. Mrs. Joe explains that the firing warns that a prisoner has escaped from the prison ships called Hulks. Pip goes to bed, terrified about the young companion coming to tear out his heart and liver and about being sent to prison for stealing food. As dawn breaks Pip sneaks to the pantry and steals food including a pork pie and a bottle of brandy. He then removes a file from Joe's blacksmith shop and heads into the marshes to give them to his oppressor.

Chapters 5-6

In Chapter 5 of Great Expectations the sergeant in charge of the soldiers at the door asks Joe if he could repair handcuffs and then explains they are tracking down two escaped convicts. Pip feels relief that they have not come for him. The working class, sergeant, Joe and Mrs Joe along with their middle-class Christmas guests view the capture of the convicts as a game like an entertaining type of fox hunt.

After Joe, who is the town blacksmith, finishes repairing the handcuffs, he proposes to his Christmas guests that they should go along on the hunt for the convicts. Mr. Wopsle agrees, but the other guests decline. Joe, Pip, and Mr. Wopsle follow the soldiers into the marsh. Pip worries that his convict will identify him if they should meet. The soldiers hurry through the marsh with Mr. Wopsle and Joe, carrying Pip on his back running after them. Moving toward the Battery, the soldiers come upon two convicts loudly fighting in the mud. The soldiers separate them, and Pip recognizes his convict. The other is the man with the bruised left cheek. Pip's convict expresses satisfaction that he prevented the other convict from escaping. The other convict accuses Pip's convict of trying to murder him.

Pip's convict looks at Pip for a moment. Pip lightly shakes his head, trying to convey that he is not an informer unsure if his convict understands. The soldiers take the two prisoners to a hut by the sea, followed by Joe, Pip, and Mr. Wopsle. Unexpectedly Pip's convict claims he stole food, including a pork pie, from a blacksmith in a nearby village. Thereby letting Pip off the hook. Joe concurs that his wife noticed the pie was missing just as the soldiers arrived. The soldiers place the two convicts in a boat, which is then rowed out to a prison hulk.

In Chapter 6 of Great Expectations Pip feels compelled to tell Joe about his theft. But Pip fears that if he comes clean Joe will always view him with suspicion and distrust. As a result, Pip decides not to reveal the truth. Exhausted, Pip naps in the kitchen. When he wakes up, he overhears Joe describing the capture of the convict and Pumblechook theorizing on how the convict committed the theft. Mrs. Joe drags Pip to bed.

Chapters 7-8

In Chapter 7 of Great Expectations Pip becomes Joe's "odd-boy," or one who does odd jobs, and goes to school, where he receives a lousy education, but is helped by an orphan named Biddy who assists Mr. Wopsle's great aunt.

One night at home Pip shows Joe a letter he wrote and although his writing has many mistakes, a proud Joe is very impressed by the letter and calls Pip a "scholar". Pip asks Joe why he never went to school and Joe explains that his alcoholic father always got in the way of his schooling. Joe also explains that he married Pip's sister because he was lonely as a single man, and Joe calls her a "fine figure of a woman." Joe says he wanted to raise baby Pip with Mrs. Joe, and Pip is touched. Joe agrees to be schooled by Pip but insists that it be kept a secret.

Mrs. Joe and Uncle Pumblechook arrive and Mrs. Joe relates the surprising news that a woman named Miss Havisham wants Pip to come to her house and play but no reason is given. Both Pip and Joe are surprised by the news.

In Chapter 8 of Great Expectations Uncle Pumblechook takes Pip to Miss Havisham's house, a dreary house that has an abandoned brewery attached to it. A proud, young lady comes to the gate and allows Pip to enter but rebuffs public shook. The girl about the same age as Pip, escorts him into the home and tells him the building is called Satis House. The girl leads Pip to the second floor and leaves him in front of a door. Pip knocks, a voice says to enter.

Pip finds himself in a dressing room lighted entirely by candles with no sunlight. He sees a strange-looking woman, Miss Havisham, seated by a dressing table, dressed in a yellowing old wedding gown. The disheveled woman looks skeletal with dark, sunken eyes, and when Pip stands before her, he sees that her watch and a clock in the room have both stopped at 20 minutes to 9.

Miss Havisham places her hand over her heart and tells Pip it's broken. She then commands Pip to play for her amusement. Pip says he can't and Miss Havisham orders Estella, the girl from earlier, to play with Pip, but she says he is but a "common laboring-boy." However, Miss Havisham convinces Estella with the enticement that she can break his heart. As they play cards with Estella spewing insults about Pip's manners and appearance, Miss Havisham asks Pip what he thinks of Estella. Pip says that she is proud and pretty but insulting and that he would like to go home.

After finishing the game, Estella takes Pip out to the yard and leaves him to get some food. When she is gone, Pip cries about feeling insulted and inferior. He enters the brewery and sees what appears to be a woman wearing a fading wedding dress, hanging from the neck by a rope attached to a beam. Horrified, Pip runs but when he looks back she's gone. Before he leaves, Estella taunts Pip even more.

Chapters 17-18

In Chapter 17 of Great Expectations Pip visits Miss Havisham on his birthday. Miss Pocket lets Pip in. Miss Havisham sits at her dressing table, and she tells Pip the same information about Estella. Miss Havisham pays Pip a guinea for coming and tells him to visit on his next birthday. Pip continues to hate his trade and is ashamed of his home. But he has come to appreciate Biddy's pleasant attitude and her talent for teaching and learning.

Pip and Biddy walk on the marsh, and Pip confesses he wants to be a gentleman to gain Estella's approval or maybe despite her. Both reasons are problematic. He knows that his infatuation with Estella is foolish, but he can't help himself. Pip confesses to Biddy that he wishes he could fall in love with her. If this happened Pip knows he would be free from his torturous adoration of Estella. But Biddy tells Pip that he will never fall in love with her.

On the way back home, Pip and Biddy meet Orlick, who wants to accompany them. Biddy confesses to Pip that Orlick is romantically interested in her. But she is not into him. An offended Pip decides to keep an eye on Orlick to make sure he doesn't move in on Biddy.

In Chapter 18 of Great Expectations at the tavern Pip recognizes a man he met on the stairs during his second visit to Miss Havisham's place. The argumentative man tells Pip and Joe that he has some personal business to discuss with them. The man informs Pip and Joe that he is Mr. Jaggers, a lawyer from London. Mr. Jaggers has come to relieve Joe of Pip's services as an apprentice and then tells Pip "that he has great expectations". Mr. Jaggers explains that an anonymous benefactor will make Pip a possessor of property when he becomes an adult, and, until then, the benefactor wants Pip to be brought up as a gentleman.

But the benefactor has two conditions. First Pip must always go by the name Pip. Second the benefactor will be keeping his name secret until the benefactor shall choose to reveal it. A stunned Pip accepts both terms.

Mr. Jaggers then tells Pip to view him as his guardian — a service he's being paid for. Pip would be paid money for his education and live as a gentleman. Mr. Jaggers sets Pip up with a tutor in London named Matthew Pocket. Pip recognizes that name as one of Miss Havisham's relatives. Mr. Jaggers leaves Pip money to buy some new clothes. Pip says he will come to London soon, and Mr. Jaggers leaves.

Biddy and Joe congratulate Pip on his change of fortune. Biddy tries to communicate the news to Mrs. Joe, who just nods happily. Pip says that, when he buys his wardrobe, he doesn't want to display himself in his new clothes for other villagers to admire, which would be "a coarse and common business".

Chapters 21-22

In Chapter 21 of Great Expectations Wemmick leads Pip to his lodgings at Barnard's Inn which is really a collection of shabby buildings surrounding a small dismal courtyard. Expecting something grander and certainly fancier, more befitting his upward driven social class movement, Pip is disappointed. Wemmick takes Pip to his apartment, where a note on the mailbox states "Return shortly." Wemmick leaves, and Pip waits for his roommate, Mr. Pocket Jr. When he arrives he and Pip greet each other, and soon Pocket recognizes Pip as the "prowling boy," and Pip recognizes Pocket as the "pale young gentleman" he fought strangely at Satis House years before.

In Chapter 22 of Great Expectations Pip and Mr. Pocket Jr. are amazed at meeting each other after so many years. Herbert Pocket (as he is actually called) explains that he was taken to Miss Havisham as a possible suitor for Estella. But Miss Havisham rejected Herbert, which was fine with him because he didn't like Estella. Pocket also confirms that Mr. Jaggers is Miss Havisham's lawyer and confidant. Pip likes Herbert's honest, easy manner and shares his own history with Miss Havisham and Estella.

During dinner Herbert reveals Miss Havisham was raised as a spoiled child by a wealthy brewer. The brewer also had a child by a woman who was not Miss Havisham's mother. This half-brother grew up wild and rebellious, and after the father died, Miss Havisham received most of the inheritance and the half-brother received a small fortune. Soon a man courted and won over Miss Havisham, who idolized him. He convinced Miss Havisham to buy out her brother's share of the brewery, but on the day of the wedding, the man sent Miss Havisham a letter saying he would not marry her. After she read the letter, Miss Havisham stopped all the clocks in her house and became a recluse. She learned her suitor and her half-brother had concocted a plan to get her money and jilt her at her wedding. Herbert's father, Matthew Pocket, is a cousin of Miss Havisham. He warned her about the suitor, which had only made her angry. She ordered him out of the house, and since then Matthew Pocket has never visited Miss Havisham.

By explaining how Miss Havisham had her heart broken, Herbert here provides motives for her behavior. Also although Pip likes Herbert very much, he believes his friend will never be very successful. Herbert works in a counting house, where he receives a small salary. Herbert aspires to be an insurer of shops, a job much more reasonable and modest than Pip's grandiose dreams. Then on Monday morning Herbert escorts Pip to his father's house. There Pip meets Mrs. Matthew Pocket, two maids, and many children running about. Mrs. Pocket has a remote, refined air. She reads a book and does little to help care of the children.

In Chapter 25 of Great Expectations Pip describes Drummle as an unintelligent sluggish snob who keeps to himself. In contrast Startop is spoiled by his mother and is devoted to her. Herbert has become a "friend and companion" of Pip, and the two enjoy long walks and talks together. Mr. and Mrs. Camilla and Georgiana, Miss Havisham's relatives, visit Mr. Matthew Pocket's house. Mrs. Camilla is Mr. Pocket's sister, and Georgiana is a cousin. The Camillas and Georgiana fawn over Pip because of his newfound prosperity. Pip does well with his studies but has developed expensive habits.

One evening after work, Wemmick takes Pip to his home in Walworth for supper. Pip finds that Wemmick's small house resembles a castle. Wemmick has cut out the top of the house to look like a battery with guns and there is a plank that serves as a drawbridge over a ditch and an attached small fortress mounted with a cannon, which the clerk fires promptly at nine o'clock each night.

Inside the main house, Wemmick introduces Pip to Wemmick's elderly nearly deaf father, called the Aged Parent or Aged P. Aged P. seems like an agreeable person who is proud of his son and the house he built and he enjoys people nodding at him and hearing the cannon go off at nine. Wemmick serves punch to Pip and talks about how "the office is one thing, and private life is another." It turns out that Mr. Jaggers has never been to Wemmick's castle-like home and knows nothing about it or the Aged P. The next morning after breakfast, Wemmick takes Pip back to London. During the walk Pip notices how Wemmick's demeanor seems to harden as they walk along.

In Chapter 26 of Great Expectations Pip, Startop and Drummle go to Mr. Jaggers's office and after the lawyer thoroughly washes his face and hands after a case, as if cleansing himself of the people or justice system. Jaggers takes the three young men to his home for dinner. Jaggers has a stately but dingy house and the lawyer himself distributes the food and drinks to his guests, taking a special interest in Drummle. The courses for the dinner are brought in by a tall, pale woman whose face looks as if "disturbed by fiery air", who seems to dread Mr. Jaggers's disapproval.

Jaggers encourages his guests to talk about themselves, thus reveal their faults. During the conversation Jaggers grabs the housekeeper's hand and tells her to show his guests her strong wrists. The housekeeper begs Jaggers not to make her do this, but he insists. She then holds out both wrists, which are deeply scarred across. Jaggers casually discusses the strength of her hands before he lets go. Afterward Pip gets into an argument with Drummle. As the three young men leave the house, Pip goes back and apologizes to Jaggers for saying anything disagreeable that happened during dinner. Jaggers indicates there is no need to apologize saying he especially likes the "Spider," referring to Drummle.
